"Sometimes it's not enough to know what things mean, sometimes you have to know what things don't mean."

Bob Dylan

"Can there be love when the mind is occupied with itself all the time?"

J. Krishnamurti

just like november

your voice heavy with the fog of waking whispered the sweetest nothings.

cool crisp mornings beneath an antique quilt waiting for coffee to perk.

this silence like the late november air grows colder each passing day.

from hearth to heaven and back again embers from an autumn bonfire.

the need for space and a place to call home beneath this setting sun.

maybe it was love or just a bit of play before dried leaves began to fall.

farewell mr. tin man

when you get right down to it a word is just a word and she piled them up so beautifully

stacked between rhyme
and artfully displayed

about a robot i believe or cassini's final end

which got me thinking of all those thoughts

we dole out to no one in particular hoping

every once and again that something might

finally connect heart to heart or (possibly)

head to head and more than mechanically

but does it really need to matter when the day is done whether we're ever able to find a home to call a home beneath this yellowing sun?

this clockwork

when she turns her head just slightly away
exposing the subtle
curve at the nape
of her angled neck
is it merely instinct which awakens these bones or is this rush to desire choiclessly made
on some microscopic, cellular level?

this dance like any other one slowly unwinds beat by subtle beat counting time like every piece
of clockwork
or crafted machinery
until it's done,
and yet just beneath
the outer layers

fluttering more than skin deep some thing
that's not a thing
continues to stretch
its wings.

it figures (my valentine)

it figures
ee cummings would emerge from the pages of my personal history (once again)
to land his message of a moon (or balloon)
and of sailing higher than one might have ever reached on one's own or even imagined possible all things considered with feet made
of clay (yet stuffed full to bursting with dreams of a keen city which no one has ever seen and spring reigns eternal) and the land is drenched with love and daisies
so many daisies

just fields and fields of daisies and no hands to pick them clean.

i feel myself (there)

i feel myself (there between each heartbeat
and deep intake
of breath)
just before it's time for bed
when you draw
the curtains (tight)
before turning out
the lights.
or when you step
from the shower (dripping wet) —
i can be found between each thought as they flow
like streams of liquid
night
bound one after next

in rapid succession (waiting for love) or waiting for time
to bring along a swift retrograde
as you take on the day (once again) emerging
into rays of golden
sunlight.

by the garden gate

spring daffodils ready to bloom as you stand like sunshine by the garden gate on a day like any other about to pull dried weeds left behind from last year wearing that silk floral summer dress which comes to rest just below the sweet curve of thighs soft as butterfly wings and twice as creamy as warm buttermilk and sitting here lost among dead thoughts of too many yesterdays never lived through i finally realize just how inadequate i felt to give what you truly needed.

a ghazal

rumi's ghazal 441 so artfully mixed with techno-pop tones haunting, divine and indescribably sweet wash over me to evoke images of another age barely recalled and quite possibly lost beneath the swirling sands of place or time yet surprisingly near to the still beating heart of all we hold dear as your pale green eyes reach across this distance and lock deeply into mine.

temptation

the look which leads to a touch soft
as velvet
her smooth flesh
warm like sunshine
beneath agnostic skies
and heated by a passion burning more than skin deep.

or a word to cleave
this silence
thick as autumn leaves
unraked
and scattered across my lawn
hungry for the tread
of bare feet
once again.

cut flowers

if we cut all flowers would others one day bloom or would our springs become a desolate thing?
it's easy to reason that scissors are to blame rather than a hand to hold them still or mind which wields cold steel — and so willingly, too.

waiting for (a moment)

seated.

at rest and (possibly?)

waiting

(for a moment)

to be

seduced by the muse

who sets time

on edge.

stretched.

each second drawn (out)

and dissected

for the barest

shred

of meaning to emerge

(once again)

into your light

of reason.

spent.

as if some sign might finally signify
a pending arrival (unlike godot?)
which shocks to life (once again)
creativity
into motion.

still the monkey

if infinite monkeys tapping away on computer keys can't possibly re-create the works of sir william no matter how many random sequences of time
happen to pass ad infinitum i wonder how well a machine might do on its own given a brush and programmed in the ways of abstract art.

needless to say
a robotic arm would need to wield the brush in order to do this trick along with someone to load an easel with paint (and write a program in the first place) but just the same could any mathematical array of lines and shapes no matter how colorfully applied be certified as art?

corporate frankenstein (thank you, walmart)

i wonder what kind of mind would conceive an idea for robo-bees (or pollination drones) flying ceaselessly through the air competing with bees for the honey they bring.
and would they be able to sting or swarming from place to place prove to be a menace for hummingbirds and monarchs gliding on gentle breezes from blossom to blossom to eat?

bone dreams

if i could think dog thoughts or understand their woofy barks would their world be filled with bone dreams
and endless squirrels
to chase up trees
and a thousand scents to follow like invisible trails that thread the landscape which eventually lead to some mysterious
treat?

i see your lips move instinctively as you retell one more story but lost in reverie your words splash harmlessly against the shell of my honed indifference.

about pandora's box

sometimes a box
is just a box
i suppose
with five sides and a lid for shutting stuff in like a bundle of letters yellowed with age
perfect for reading
on cold rainy days
or a book full of quotes dog-eared at the pages which resonate most depending on which
of your moods is in play like some stuck
pendulum.

it's a funny thing about pandora's box this proverbial "place" and all that it means

from pithos to pathos and those spaces between like an echo chamber of soul
for what we believe whether or not we ever dare to peek
below the shuttered
surface of self so seemingly fated.

a perfect paradox?

he wrote of a perfect paradox hinged on the sole fact of our shared existence (or experience as such) and how we yearn so much for something richer or deeper than what is most commonly lived — but the truth of the matter lies closer to the heart of this strange desire to be more like machines while dreaming of a day when robots work and play with all the emotions we fear which seemingly tear us apart.

in ashes

days past strewn like ashes scattered haphazardly at your feet.
gods and dreams lose their luster in the clarity of a question.
if only you thought to awaken like a flower ready to bloom.
words are just sounds strewn like ashes at the end of another day.

into dust (for faiz ahmed faiz) with seven lines you moved me from night to someplace deeper than despair a bittersweet truth (perhaps) that what has passed (as it always must) finds its way into dust like orange groves on the edge of timbuktu never again to bloom.

a landscape

three jet-black crows
as fat as cats
perch like statues
atop three old wooden gray fence posts lined up in a row which lean awkwardly
by the side of the road.
in the distance
ogonowski's barn sits on a low rise
its red painted sides just a bitter memory as long beams of bare wood bake in this late afternoon september sun.
given enough time
even crows will fly far from these overgrown fields choked full
with thistle and clover

as his once fertile farm lies fallow now
returning to dust
and weeds.

until it's gone

we treat all life so cheaply
until it's gone

and then with head's bowed appropriately down

for all the world to see line up one by one in another endless procession to pay what are called

"respects" eulogizing the lost but why not celebrate life daily (among the living) instead of throwing away again a gift not ours to keep and given for a purpose deeper than most can possibly imagine.

as we always do

a story is just a story which ends as it begins
as it must,
as they always do
and those threads we weave together from imagination or belief (the questions we fail to ask) — yet standing now somewhere near the middle of this particular dream i see the starts and stops much more clearly than before —
about how what we tell ourselves (whether quietly or aloud) resounds in the spaces of our waking hours which helps determine what will rebound our way and what we'll tell ourselves it all means —

as it must,
and as we always do.

befri(ended)

i have no idea what you see from your shuttered balcony and truth be told i'm afraid to ask about those crowded city streets teeming with the fevered pitch of unfettered humanity while i check in from this quiet refuge (and somewhat relieved).

it's strange how fate crossed our divergent paths (exquisitely so) where one part ended while another began sewn seamlessly together like different chapters of a book without end or scenes from a play which seems most days like nothing more than a dream.

rusted out a single strand of rusted barbed wire tacked to an old gray fence post and broken off on both ends hangs suspended in space and out of place while just below a patch of daisies in blooms of yellow and white invite a steady stream of honey bees that dance in a rhythm much older than time and beyond the remains of this fence a field of knee high clover circles old man jenkin's weathered rotary tiller anchored in mud for the past twenty years yet once clearly indispensable but that's the funny thing about the tools at our disposal which we cling to as implements of our diversions until one day having outgrown their usefulness they are lost or left behind.

paradigm lost?

all those words
which you've heard
piled high like stones have weight, have power to move you into joy or darkest despair.
they are more than a mere vibration of dead air
as the seeds of your becoming that take root
like lines of code
to program a machine.

which words have shaped your dreams?

down (to this)

if i could distill all true teachings
down to just one word (or possibly
two) that might ease your troubled mind it would finally lead to this —
BE
kind (to yourself).

fading (into memory)

at the end of this charade what words are left to say?
and would it even matter should i come up with just the perfect phrase?
like a full glass of water forgotten on a window sill the colors of my reflection have slowly bled away by some process
of evaporation, leaving only these residued remains behind.

please keep me
in mind.

which, if left to chance?

it's a bit like
what quantum physics states about entanglement and the connective thread which seems to run through us all, seen (or quite possibly felt?) as some "spooky action at a distance" or non-local phenomena and this truth that troubled einstein so leading to his famous dictum that god doesn't play dice with the universe, as if the god which exists far beyond our imagining must somehow submit to the simple laws of arithmetic.
or perhaps more like when bukowski quipped, approaching as always from the somewhat sordid side of life, about how we carry around our beloved (and intimately so?) at the tattered edges of a brain despite these constantly grinding gears of time and space which daily tear away at this still small center of self,

until nothing left
can remain.

some illusion of love

robots never dream
and robots don't go to bed and their well-engineered mechanical hearts
won't beat with the same blood or passion
as men.

and in between cold sheets surrendered to the darkness which bled into dreams of monkey love i can only dread such cold stainless steel precision.

feed my soul with dreams pure like butter
which can lift us up from the dead even if all that's left to me is some illusion of love instead.

each passing day

if i could sit by the sea with an eye on the tide rolling slowly in wave after foaming blue wave would i be able to savor each moment passing by or would my mind wander off once again like a kite left behind and lost on a breeze the string trailing in its wake as it sails awkwardly away on warm eddies of air headed for some foreign shore or faint horizon or perhaps catches a downdraft and suddenly plummets nose-ward into blue grey swells so far from the reach of children chasing gulls on the beach?

the slow turn

i wonder what a tiny cog in a big machine doing its littlest part in the grander scheme of things rolling and turning in sync with neighboring gears meshing tooth into tiniest tooth might offer by way of some realized truth should it or could it stop to reflect for a moment or two on its own tiny lot in this particular life as one like the rest (only not) —

is this the end or simply a pause as a steady rain does its best to wash away the rusted remains of far too many yesterdays

while i (slowly)
turn blue.

under it all

rain.
slashing thru space.
slanting thru gray skies to splash on this window today.
monotonous and rhythmic with a beat like hot water music
filling my soul
with muted notes
rolling darkly in
from another
time and place.
heavy rain
falling on a heavy day that awaken images nearly forgotten
like cave paintings which dot the landscape in acacus.

my sands of time
melt slowly away
beneath this unrelenting
rain.

blood and bone

you haunt my dreams
my waking hours with a presence more palpable and rich
than blood or bone
for its singular absence — an echoed silence in the hall which lingers still or coffee mug stained with lipstick
by the kitchen sink
or a simple remembrance of what was shared
and what was shed
in those unsaid moments between us until summer suns no longer loitered on your skin like a delicate kiss or supple touch
soft as a whispered
breath.

i, surrender

not to the thought
but for how it often takes root.
not any idle wish but the impulse to make one at all.
and not those images always in mind
but what they might possibly mean.
somewhere between the ego's craving and a higher self whose whispered breath is but a sweet caress
to a seemingly deaf
inner ear
you'll find me waiting, forever surrendered.

out like a whisper

i

words afraid to whisper in a lover's ear (for fear of the fool
lurking deep within us all)
so by proxy
instead and through an incandescent screen you'll admit to (a certain) dream.

ii

eyes which lock from across a crowded room (or any empty

space) and in an instant just seems right
in ways beyond words to fathom
what might pass and what feels light even in those moments of entertaining
a (certain)
thought.

iii

lost and loaded in this latest digression hung with the weight of (a certain) perception and out in the open
like a whisper.

iv

pools which reflect a face (just the latest one in a running sequence of stories woven
this into next
which complement
a certain time
and place)
and those mirrors
you're afraid to face
whose polished surfaces whisper and reveal lines which cut deep and unerringly
true.

Acknowledgments

I don't know why I write these poems, or for whom. Maybe as Bob Dylan said, "the people in my songs are all me." So maybe this is nothing more than a song to myself... of sorts. Hopefully not of the ego-centric variety.

That said, there are people in my life who inspire me to keep going. My aunt Dolly, for instance, recently said to me "keep writing." How sweet is that? And my dear friend Mark reads most (all?) of the poems I write once I consider them "worthy" of someone else's eyes. My wife and kids continue to put up with me, smiling all the way, so that's probably worthy of a thousand "thank yous" from me. Though, when you get right down to it, "thank you" often sounds (and seems) so hollow when compared with love – true, deep and active. Or as I like to say, "vibrant and alive."

So, alive and still kicking one final thanks to you for picking up a copy of this book. Hopefully something resonated with you (and continues to do so) and if not, then here is my heartfelt apology.

“The question is: If the brain is not active, if it is not working, if it is not thinking, what is going to happen to it? Either it will plunge into entertainment — and the religions, the rituals and the pujas are entertainment — or it will turn to the inquiry within. This inquiry is an infinite movement. This inquiry is religion.”

J Krishnamurti,
A Timeless Spring
